STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Argyle Hotel was erected in 1855 for William Rae at the height of the post gold rush hotel building boom in Geelong. Architect John Young, noted for his earlier designs for the 'Golden Age' and 'Bay View' hotels in Geelong, designed the Argyle hotel in a similar classically derived style which was dominated by modeling brick parapets, architraves and mouldings in distinctive patterns. In August 1857 a meeting held in the Argyle Hotel led to the formation of the Borough of Newtown and Chilwell. The Argyle hotel is one of the first establishments of the 1850's in Geelong.

The Argyle Hotel was an important meeting place in the nineteenth century for people to discuss such things as, the separation of Newtown and Chilwell and Thomson ward from Geelong, and meetings of the Geelong Football Club. The building was designed by the important Geelong based architect John Young and is one of the two known examples by him which brickwork has been used in this innovative way to stylize Italian High Renaissance elements. It is of State significance.

Description

The Argyle is a two storey red brick building (now painted), constructed in English garden wall bond. It has freestone window sills, plus shutters on the first floor. The ground floor windows are recessed with segmental arched window heads supported by brackets represented in brickwork. The Tympanum is hollow and between these the use of the stringcourse with dentils below is evident. Young has carried the theme right through his design to the balustrade parapet supported by brackets, all these Renaissance elements being represented by stylized brick. While Young's use of brick is similar in both this hotel and the Golden Age Hotel (a better example), almost every detail is formed in a different way. The section at the northern end which has no surface decoration, is a later addition.
